We are facing an urgent need to transition away from our reliance on climate-changing fossil fuels. Yet our government not only denies that this is a problem—they are also determined to make it harder to solve. In addition to political resistance, we need local, grassroots action to build resilience at the community level.

This where those most affected by government policy have the greatest ability to shape it. It’s also the place where it may still be possible to work around political stereotypes to identify common values and goals.
